The typical office floor design for this innovative communications company radiated around a central plaza where an open coffee bar and a relaxed seating area served as the hub of activity for impromptu conversations and small team meetings. Conference rooms and open employee work spaces surrounded this center area.

The Network Management Center was used as a marketing center as well as a national support center for telecommunications operations. The Center required a large open area with a substantial ceiling height to allow 42 command stations to have visibility to 3 large video monitors and 16 smaller monitors at the front of the room.
